

Arabic: A unique language of the world

Hafiz Mukhtiar Ahmed Kandhro*

Experts of linguistics are agreed upon the fact that Arabic language is the most important and unique language of Semitic race, but they have different opinions about which was the first language of the first man on earth and about its first cradle as well.

Some of profound experts are of this opinion that the first language of the first man on earth was Arabic language.

Despite all these differences, it is undeniable historical fact that written and preserved literature of Arabic, which we have today, goes to ancient ages of the history. The thing which played more important role in preserving and strengthening this language was revelation of the last Testament i.e. The Holy Quran. It added to its glory and eloquence which took it up high in lingual standard.

From deep and vast study of this language it appears that Arabic is capable of being language of modern science and research in the present world, besides this it has some peculiarities which are rarely found in international languages of the world.

I will present my research and analysis on the topic in this article.

*Hafiz Mukhtiar Ahmed Kandhro is a Lecture at the Department of Islamic Culture, University of Sindh, Jamshoro. He has also done M A in English and is interested in religious and literary studies.